HE CONTEMPLATED SUICIDE

And Got on a Ferryboat to Carry out his Resolution-Then Something Happened That Droye all Thoughts of Self-destruction out of his Mind. Attitude of People in Face of Death.

New York Sun: "Once in a while it comes to every man, Liteckon," said the cross-eyed gambler, "to figure up how he would face death if it came right down to cases. Taking it all in all, there ain't any of us ever called on to do any figuring of that sort. Either a man gets passed out by some sort of for calculating his own feelings, or else he dies of an illness that saps his vitality gradually, so that when the end comes he simply drops away without a struggle. It's a mighty few chance of a man going up against the final with a pair of fieldglasses to his eyes, so to speak, and a first chop view of the whole field. I've always thought that if I was in a crowd, that was on the actions, only I'd probably be too rattled myself to think of anything but keeping a steady jaw. Well, I've had a chance of my life at that, under conditions when I didn't have to get rattled for myself, and I can hereby notify you that once is enough. Interesting? Well, it just sweated interest, that perthat was going either. Besides, I've got my own life to look after nowadays. Then I didn't have.

'No, I wasn't a dead one. Just getting ready to be. That's all. What the preachers call a Benign Providence had handed me a couple of uppercuts that just about got mercady for a permanent nap. Never mind what It was just all kinds of trouble, and when I boarded the ferryboat in Brooklyn I had calculated to leave my last quarter on the modestly slip over the rail into oblivion. On the whole, I couldn't discover that I made a very great hit by living. Once over the rall it would be a cinch, for I couldn't swim a stroke and I figured that my luck wasn't of the kind that would make me jump off a boat into the arms of a life preserver. Well, I stood there trying to pick out a patch of river that looked a little less cold and wet than the average, and wishing I'd blown in the quarter for drink to brace me up a little, when I found out that something was happening out in front. There was a great old racket and a tooting and shouting, then we hit something like running into an express train head on, and it was only by a champion clutch rail before my time. That jarred all the suicide out of me. I started forward life preserver. It'll come in handy.' and found a first-class riot going on i the cabin, so I went through to the car-

First thing I struck was a three hun-dred pounder; don't believe you could have sunk her with a wagon lead of wall trying to faint, I tucked her up in the preserver. By sacrificing my last necktle I got it fastened onto her, and all the while she had me by the neck and was praying me not to forsake her. There was more business to be done in other places, and I broke out of that clinch, though it almost cost me my shirt to get loose, and looked for another lady that needed to be saved.
